SAN ONOFRE: CLASHING VIEWS ON REPAIR COSTS, RESTART

On October 9 the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) held a 3-hour public meeting in Dana Point (South Orange County). The evening event drew a standing-room-only attendance of 500 – 600. A roundtable of environmentalists, nuclear energy industry representatives, union leaders and concerned citizens offered opening statements and responded to questions from the audience.

The meeting's central focus was whether to attempt a restart of Unit 2 at the San Onofre nuclear power plant in North San Diego County. San Onofre has been shut down since January after extensive and unexpected wear on piping in the plant's steam generator system caused a leak of radioactive steam.

A few days before the meeting, Southern California Edison (SCE) filed with the NRC a 1,000-page report based on an eight-month analysis of the problem. SCE's hope is that the NRC will agree to a restart of Unit 2 for a five-month test at 70% power, which the utility argues will optimize electricity production while avoiding stress levels that damaged the piping. Unit 3 at San Onofre has more extensive repair requirements and is not proposed by SCE for restart.

NRC's District 4 Administrator Elmo Collins, lead spokesperson for the agency at the meeting, told attendees it would take NRC staff months to review SCE's analysis. This confirms a similar statement regarding timeframe made on September 12 by NRC Chair Allison Macfarlane.

Collins and Macfarlane have stated that NRC will not authorize restart unless safety concerns are satisfied. But environmental representatives on the roundtable expressed reservations about a decision based on NRC internal review and called for an alternative process known as an Adjudicatory Hearing and License Amendment. This process would include evidentiary hearings with sworn testimony and cross-examination by experts independent of the NRC, utilities and the nuclear power industry.

If such a process were used, those in favor of a San Onofre restart would likely argue that the problem is not related to the plant's nuclear power system and is technically fixable, that the proposed test levels are within safe limits of both time and intensity, and that San Onofre's 2000 megawatt capability cannot quickly be replaced within the regional power grid.

Opponents would likely counter that San Onofre's age makes it a candidate for shutdown rather than repair, that its location at the water's edge makes the plant vulnerable to tsunamis and the earthquakes that cause them, and that the 8 million people who live within 50 miles of the plant (9 times the population density of Fukushima) could be impossible to evacuate in an emergency.

A related issue is who pays to keep the plant in standby condition and who would pay for repairs. For more than eight months, ratepayers for SCE and its San Onofre partner San Diego Gas & Electric (SDG&E) have been paying $54 million a month – an average of $10 per household – for a plant that delivers no electricity yet is staffed by hundreds of workers.

The steam generator problem arose from an untested design developed by Mitsubishi Heavy Industries and bought by SCE for San Onofre at a cost of $671 million. Stress testing in advance of operating the system relied on computer modeling that proved defective. SCE failed to anticipate such problems when it signed a contract with Mitsubishi limiting the manufacturer's liability to $137 million.

If the crowd response on October 9 was indicative, there appears to be a groundswell of sentiment that SCE and SDG&E shareholders, not their customers, should bear the cost for repairs and maintaining the plant's stand-by status.

On October 25, the California Public Utilities Commission (PUC) will meet in Irvine (Orange County). At that time the PUC will face a state law requiring it to launch an investigation into San Onofre's ten-month shutdown and to review the question of "who pays" for a non-producing power plant. Complex scenarios could result, including possible ratepayer rebates in 2013.

Realistically, if the PUC calls a halt to the $54 million per month ratepayer subsidy, it will confront San Onofre's operators with the question of whether to wait months for the NRC's decision in hopes of attempting a repair or whether, as most environmentalists believe, the current situation gives timely warning that the hour has arrived for a San Onofre shut-down.

We are always looking for members to volunteer to help out in various ways. So of the opportunities to get involved are:

1. We are creating an effort to go to each of the various media offices to introduce ourselves and begin to create a relationship with the editors so that our outings, meetings, and events will get better publicity. We would like to put together teams of two people to make the visits. We have a few already and would really appreciate more volunteers. It will be fun, as well as useful. Contact Mike Sappingfield to help
2. A hospitality chair to coordinate the refreshments at the various meetings would be of great value. Contact Patty Sappingfield for more information and to help.
3. Assistant Membership Chair — will work with the current Membership Chair to contact new and prospective members to provide information and to answer their questions as well as assist them to join the Sierra Club.
